LPT: Don't throw your junk mail away. Use it to help the USPS instead!

Miscellaneous

Next time you get a credit card offer in the mail, or a junk piece of mail that includes a prepaid envelope or postcard, don't throw it away! Send the envelope back with a blank sheet of paper inside, or don't fill the postcard out, but still send it back. The company that sent it to you has to pay the USPS for postage on each one they get back. This is a way to support the USPS by doing very little, and sticking it to the annoying companies that want all of your money.

In the 90s we would send companies "hate mail" by stuffing prepaid envelopes with things like 'blanks' (flat heavy metal pieces), a roofing shingle) and layers of other competitors' mail or junk news. This is because the company would have to pay more upon recieving the junk mail. It eats into them. It actually somewhat reduced our junk mail returnables, I think.

Send that mail y'all.

Just for some proof: independent.co.uk/life-style/gad... Uber tried to BS themselves by saying they don't use battery level to make fares more expensive (which back then they did...), but also said "it's a strong predictor" on surge sensitivity - showing they actively collect and use it.

Uber knows when your phone is about to die
Uber knows when the battery on your phone is running low – and that you are more likely to pay higher "surge" prices for a car as a result. The taxi-hailing app ...

Important things to keep in mind!

- never take from 'mom and pop' type store. Its likely you'll actually harm them, whereas taking from a walmart wont effect much.

- never take items that a worker is assigned to monitor (usually super expensive items), theyll be in trouble for it. and its usually a minimum wage worker and usually they lose hours or pay, or they even get fired.

- similar to the above, never take things that are usually locked up for the above reason

- if its a store you know gives their near-expiration products to workers/charity, try to avoid taking the near expiration products.

- if youre taking clothing, avoid leaving hangers. it sounds weird, but itll make it seem like it was more likely an error in the computer than a theft, since the empty hanger sitting there will seem suspicious.

- also for clothing, try not to take more than one item at once, as it will look suspicious if theres 10 medium shirts missing, and it won't be written off as just a stocking error. and it will lead to workers being penalized

- basically just always consider 'will this harm a worker' and if the answer is yes then dont do it like i was homeless for a while when i was younger and i tried to follow those guidelines to avoid doing harm to people who were probably not much better off than me while trying to get food for myself.

it's a thing. I won't even lie. I watched someone slip a nursing exam book in their bag at the store I worked at. She made eye contact with me and the blood drained from her face. I simply gave her a sympathetic nod and walked away.

I live in a small town and I knew she was a waitress at a hotel my sister works at, and people at that hotel don't tip well during off season. Nursing exam books are 50+ bucks. Being a med student myself, I didn't even breathe a word, and when inventory came up later and the book was missing, I suggested it was likely a mislabel, and the manager wrote it off.

Sometimes, thievery is a necessity. Don't send people to jail over petty things.

Why is Democratic control of the Senate important?

- It would be much easier to make policy on key issues like healthcare, LGBTQ rights, climate change, tax policy, immigration, and economic recovery. You want Biden to be able to pursue progressive policies? Control of the Senate would be a major boost.
- Biden's legislative and international agenda is majorly compromised if the Senate becomes a stalling point. Avoiding legislative gridlock is crucial to getting things done in general, and particularly to manage the pandemic and start undoing the damage Trump's administration has done.
- The Senate confirms senior government appointees to the administration - this affects Biden's ability to pick his Cabinet and appoint judges.
- If the Democrats are able to gain control of all three offices, they can change the filibuster, making it much more difficult for Republicans to block measures.
- Conversely, if the Senate is the only chamber that Republicans retain control of, there's a major possibility that Republicans will use it to be purposely obstructive to progressive policies, just because they're progressive and also because it's in their interest to make a Biden presidency as ineffective as possible.

Ian: It's always difficult when you put yourself out there. For example, when the show came out, Common Sense Media, a foundation purporting to be "the leading source of entertainment and technology recommendations for families and schools," posted a now-removed review that went on at length about how Steven Universe has bad role models because "A black character wears an oversize Afro and has ample, curvy thighs; a loud-mouthed woman's plumped lips and tight-fitting clothing add to the effect of her crudity" and more insulting things. I remember thinking, "People in my life look like these characters." I'm reminded of the women in my life when I see these characters. People with large lips exist. People who have Afros exist. It's tough when you're putting your personal experiences out there and people are telling you that your body is not real or harmful just because of who you are—it can be scary sometimes.

Characterizing lip size, hairstyle, or body shape as offensive betrays a belief that specific features like these should never be found in a cartoon.

Ian: For instance, there's a page on TV Tropes about Afros, and it's written in this super-gross, looking-well

^^^ This right here brings me back to the early bullshit criticism of the show and it's just as infuriating as I remember.

- instead of "abolish ice," say "immigration reform" and "create a new agency for immigration and citizenship services"
- instead of "medicare for all," say "universal health care" or even just really harp on making healthcare affordable and accessible to everyone
- instead of "the green new deal" (which was a great piece of messaging in the first place before it became inextricably tied up with aoc's theatrics), talk about what an effective piece of climate legislation will create, not what it will destroy. when you say "ban fracking" or "ban fossil fuels" or "reduce methane emissions in agriculture" people go "YOU WON'T TAKE MY JOB OR MY FARTING COWS." climate is really an area where being able to reframe it through the language of capitalism helps. say "let's give tax breaks to farmers, especially small family farms who are already being squeezed out by the big guys, so they can invest in the future of their business" and other noise-shaped air stuff like that. instead of "ban fracking" talk about the jobs that renewable energy will create in communities that have been left behind by our reliance on foreign oil. i mean, fuck, the phrase "climate change" can be a real problem when you're talking to the whole country because of how effective the "climate and weather are the same things" and "climate change is a hoax" disinfo campaigns have been over the past 20 years or so - but when you talk about "conserving our natural resources" and all that teddy roosevelt, ranger rick shit, it just comes across different.
- instead of "abortion rights".... listen, you know i hate equivocating about abortion but at the end of the day, when you're talking to people who are probably anti-abortion for religious reasons but will still vote democrat because they're not a single-issue anti-abortion voter, don't say "abortion (on demand without apology etc)," say "the constitutional right to privacy" or "the right to make personal medical decisions without the government intervening." fearmonger about attacks on abortion the way sarah palin fearmongered about how obamacare would lead to "death panels" deciding whether your grandma would live or die! and if you're talking to someone who just doesn't feel that strongly about abortion because yada yada roe is settled who cares, talk about how "empowering women to decide when they start a family fuels economic growth and leads to more wanted children growing up in stable, happy two-parent homes" and so on.
- inversely, instead of "abolish the death penalty," talk about "saving the lives of the innocent" and "an eye for an eye makes the whole world blind" if you're talking to a christian and honestly just look at the libertarian arguments against the death penalty and ape some of those - cost to the taxpayer, high wrongful conviction rates as a reflection of government incompetence. honestly, the libertarian right is frequently aligned with the left on criminal justice issues and i know we all love to dunk on libertarians but the language they use is pretty appealing to moderates who might be coming from a more conservative background or region where it's just normal
- instead of "democratic socialism," just talk about, like, values - ending poverty and hunger, living wages and better educational opportunities, creating jobs and protecting ordinary working people and families and putting money back in their pockets and creating a stable economy. people really do vote based on kitchen table issues and you can really make a moral appeal on the rest.
- instead of "tax the rich," say "cut taxes." period. never talk about raising taxes. not on the rich, not on the middle class, not for any reason whatsoever, even if you're saying "if we raise taxes on billionaires we can give everyone a pony." i don't care how much you want to tax billionaires, don't fucking bring it up. i hate bezos as much as everyone but we live in america, where everyone is simply a temporarily embarrassed billionaire and convinced that taxing the ultra-rich will somehow hurt them too. don't expect middle-of-the-road normies to get on board with the "i'll pay more taxes if it means other people have health care" thing you see from avowed liberals and lefties, because they will not, i'm sorry. frankly i have no interest in paying more taxes because nyc already taxes you out the nose regardless of where you are on the socioeconomic scale and if someone suggested i should pay more, even if it meant paying less on private services in the long run, i would simply be like, "nope!" so like, yeah, obviously the goal is to eliminate corporate tax loopholes and tax the ultra-rich at a higher rate while cutting tax burdens on everyone else, but what you want to say is stuff like "small business owners shouldn't pay more in taxes than the companies like apple and amazon that are already squeezing them out" and "we'll cut taxes and frivolous government spending," period, no embellishment. "making american companies pay american taxes" is a succinct catchphrase i like to use.

- instead of "defund/spend less on the military," say "why is the government spending so much on building outdated outdated tanks and submarines from 50 years ago and so little on services for veterans? we need to revitalize our military spending so that we can spend less on safer, more modern equipment, preserve those manufacturing jobs, and make sure that veterans get the health care and job opportunities they deserve." get it? like, republicans have been selling the "cut waste, cut taxes, cut spending" line for decades because it sounds good and people really respond to it. unfortunately, one of the many cursed legacies of ronald reagan is that most people still think that balancing a government budget is like balancing a checkbook, and obviously that's not true but it lends a lot of familiar comparisons and metaphors, so like... use them.
- don't equivocate on "black lives matter" - it's too important and too urgent - instead, give the non-activist liberals you already know the accessible language they can use to help normalize the phrase "black lives matter" in their own lives and encourage them to do so. they won't convert the full-on blue lives matter cult members and other assorted balls-to-the-wall racists, but there are people in the middle who just need to hear a targeted explanation of why that isn't a combative or controversial statement, and that totally depends on the individual... there's the very basic 101-logicky "if saying 'save the whales' doesn't mean you think dolphins can kick rocks, or if saying 'spinach is a vegetable' doesn't mean that you think lettuce isn't, why does 'black lives matter' imply that other lives don't?" and i saw someone in the christians against trump group cite a brene brown quote they said ("In order for slavery to work, in order for us to buy, sell, beat, and trade people like animals, Americans had to completely dehumanize slaves. And whether we directly participated in that or were simply a member of a culture that at one time normalized that behavior, it shaped us. We can't undo that level of dehumanizing in one or two generations. I believe Black Lives Matter is a movement to rehumanize black citizens. All lives matter, but not all lives need to be pulled back into moral inclusion. Not all people were subjected to the psychological process of demonizing and being made less than human so we could justify the inhumane practice of slavery.") that made it click for them and they like to use to make it click for others, and there's also this example that i think is probably pretty resonant for christians:

Our pastor had a great message that many people responded to. The crux of it was, yes, biblically, we believe all lives matter. That's what God's kingdom looks like. We're called to bring that about.

Now, how do we know if we 'matter?' We know we matter if we are able to have our basic needs met. If we're able to feel safe and loved by our community, etc., then she went on to outline the historical discrimination that makes this difficult for people of color, and this is why we have to assert that black lives matter right now- because we have to do the kingdom work to address those issues till we can demonstrate that they do, indeed, matter.

I'm not saying she tipped the angry hardliners, but many others communicated to her that it helped them understand. The thing is the hardliners who love to the point is, as with all the rest of this, that there are a lot of people out there who are alienated by the language (because there has been a billion-dollar media propaganda machine working overtime to make the language as alienating as possible) but not by the content of the argument. the right is SO good at messaging to its base by speaking their language, dog whistles and all. but because the democratic party is a coalition of moderates and liberals and leftists, you really have to be strategic about your messaging in a way that the right doesn't. frankly, that's why joe biden won - he made those same broad appeals to morality and civility and unity and prosperity that people want to hear.

i realize that everyone feels that if you have the moral high ground, you shouldn't have to put in work to persuade people because they should automatically grasp that you're right, but like i said above, this is america, and it doesn't work like that. we need to talk to people, not in buzzwords or in highly stigmatized language that risks turning them off immediately, but in language that already means something to them. if you want to persuade people you have to actually make things sound appealing to them, whether that means evoking warm and fuzzy mental images or appealing to their principles and moral convictions and religious beliefs or just doing your best to sound like the adults in the room. you gotta do this stuff to build a majority instead of just a plurality within this party, because that's just what we need to win.

If you want to see this side of the argument in action: witness Dan Price on Fox News reframing Universal Basic Income as "taking money out of the government and putting it in the hands of everyday Americans," which is just. chef's kiss Speaking as someone raised by and around conservatives, they will eat that shit UP.

Some freshman advice from a woman who has been out of high school for 2 years. If you're 14, and that 18+ year old wants to date you or says they love you, thats called grooming. If they have s*x with you, that's called statutory r*pe. And they're just gonna break up with you after they've gotten what they wanted.

If you're 14 and they're 18 or older, there is no way to make a healthy relationship out of that. Now if you're both adults, maybe it can work but an 18 year old and a 54 year old is kind of strange. But to each their own. I wouldn't date someone more than 6 or 7 years older than me and I'm 20. Thats because we're in different places in life if they're any older than maybe 28.

able to speak and openly converse with Steven.

Maya Petersen [storyboard artist]: I forgot about those! I think one of Steven Universe's strongest points—even despite being fairly talky—is the way it shows rather than tells, so maybe the internal narration would have been out of place.

Before boarding on Future, I remember talking to Rebecca briefly about how Steven had been the moral compass of the show up to this point, as a consequence of the story being told strictly from his point of view. This isn't verbatim what she said, but what I took from that conversation was that one of the goals of this last season was to demonstrate that while Steven's a very good boy, he has been an unreliable narrator and a biased moral compass—even if we maintained the Steven-only POV for Future [with the exception of "I Am My Monster" (S1E19)].

After season five, which ended with "Change Your Mind," the movie went into production, and then season six ramped up

This is the type of perspective that makes SU and SUF so much more interesting to me: Steven "has been an unreliable narrator and a biased moral compass". I think the Steven-only pov wouldn't truly hit if it wasn't for this aspect of his character, especially with the addition of Future. It's easy enough to simply accept what the narrator of the show is feeding you and assume that their perspective is the "right" perspective, when in reality, we're just viewing the story through one set of eyes and following the actions of one very self-sacrificing, heroic, and traumatized child. It was apparent throughout the original series, but I feel like seeing Steven fall apart in SUF really tied it all together.

And I agree 150% that Steven is a very good boy and I love him with all my heart.

The developer has been working on this for years and puts out a new version whenever Spotify updates something (or tries to change something to make the hack stop working). In the past it has been a little spotty with the occasional crashes, but the current version is very reliable!

Why is Democratic control of the Senate important?

- It would be much easier to make policy on key issues like healthcare, LGBTQ rights, climate change, tax policy, immigration, and economic recovery. You want Biden to be able to pursue progressive policies? Control of the Senate would be a major boost.
- Biden's legislative and international agenda is majorly compromised if the Senate becomes a stalling point. Avoiding legislative gridlock is crucial to getting things done in general, and particularly to manage the pandemic and start undoing the damage Trump's administration has done.
- The Senate confirms senior government appointees to the administration - this affects Biden's ability to pick his Cabinet and appoint judges.
- If the Democrats are able to gain control of all three offices, they can change the filibuster, making it much more difficult for Republicans to block measures.
- Conversely, if the Senate is the only chamber that Republicans retain control of, there's a major possibility that Republicans will use it to be purposely obstructive to progressive policies, just because they're progressive and also because it's in their interest to make a Biden presidency as ineffective as possible.

I literally have absolutely no complaints with the movie at all. Once, my friend and I did comparisons from the book and the movie, and we found the only major difference was the fact that Stanley wasn't heavy set when he arrived at the camp in the movie. The majority of the script is raw quotations from the book.
This is my favorite book to movie adaptation and it did everything Percy Jackson, Inkheart, and The Golden Compass didn't.

And the only reason Stanely wasn't heavy set was because in the book he loses tons of weight and eventually ends up being almost thin. The director said he didn't want to force an adolescent boy to lose weight on such a quick filming schedule, and L'bouf's audition was so spot on, that they decided to go with a thinner Stanely from the beginning

American Airlines Policy Effectively Bans Power Wheelchair Users From Flying to 130 U.S. Airports - Wheelchair Travel

American Airlines has established a new policy which prevents many disabled people from traveling with power wheelchairs on...

WHEELCHAIR TRAVEL

theunholystromboli Follow

You should read this article, but in case you don't read the article, the reason they suddenly won't transport power wheelchairs is because THEY WERE BREAKING TOO MANY OF THEM. They CONSTANTLY break wheelchairs and their response is to BAN DISABLED PEOPLE FROM TRAVELING RATHER THAN TEACH THEIR EMPLOYEES HOW TO SAFELY HANDLE WHEELCHAIRS

Abled people can and should reblog this, but don't say any ableist bullshit in the notes/reblogs

themanicmonocle Follow

How is this not lawsuit-worthy?

phoenixonwheels Follow

Hey so fun fact the ACAA was written specifically so you can't sue airlines for violating it. Isn't that great? 🙃

jenroses Follow

Those big power chairs cost upwards of $30,000 to $50,000 in many cases. I have on that is 434 pounds. It's very comfortable and functional at home, in my neighborhood, and worth the trouble to drive to conventions.

It is, however, not something I could imagine flying with.

What I do fly with, and run errands with, is my Electra HD wide folding power wheelchair. It does not have head support or elevating leg rests, but it is ultra lighweight, the batteries last for fucking ever, and it is lightweight enough that even though it's a bariatric power chair capable of supporting up to 400 pounds and going about 15 miles, it's only 58 pounds with the batteries in.

My procedure for flying is to take it to the gate, take out the batteries and unlock the wheels and turn it completely off, and then let someone push me up to the door of the airplane. I take the batteries and joystick as carry ons, the wheelchair folds and gets gate-checked, and it's waiting for me at the gate at the other end. It cost about 3 grand.

I have to rest more with a chair like this, spend more time in bed to let my feet deflate, etc., while traveling, but the light weight nature means that at home, I can get it in and out of my minivan without help and without a ramp (and if I do need help, the same folks who help me get my groceries to the car are ALWAYS willing to help with the last little push to get it in, it's not that heavy because half the weight is always on two of the wheels through the whole process.)

The batteries last for freakin' ever, normally I get about 10 shopping trips out of it before it drops a single bar and I need to recharge it, so I only really end up recharging it every 2-3 weeks. The big chair gets charged every single night, all night, because the batteries drain just sitting there.

When I took the lightweight to London, we spent an entire day away from the hotel, and ran out of batteries on the bus back, and I turned on the chair on the bus and the regenerative braking charged up the batteries enough to get the thing off the bus again, and then we turned it off and unlocked it and my husband used it like a transport chair to push me the block back to the hotel.

Anyway, for people who CAN deal with not having full support 100% of the time, it's a much more manageable option and means I almost never have to cancel because something will involve too much walking.

So not a solution for everyone, but honestly very worth it if you can deal with a lighter weight chair. I added a better seat cushion to mine.

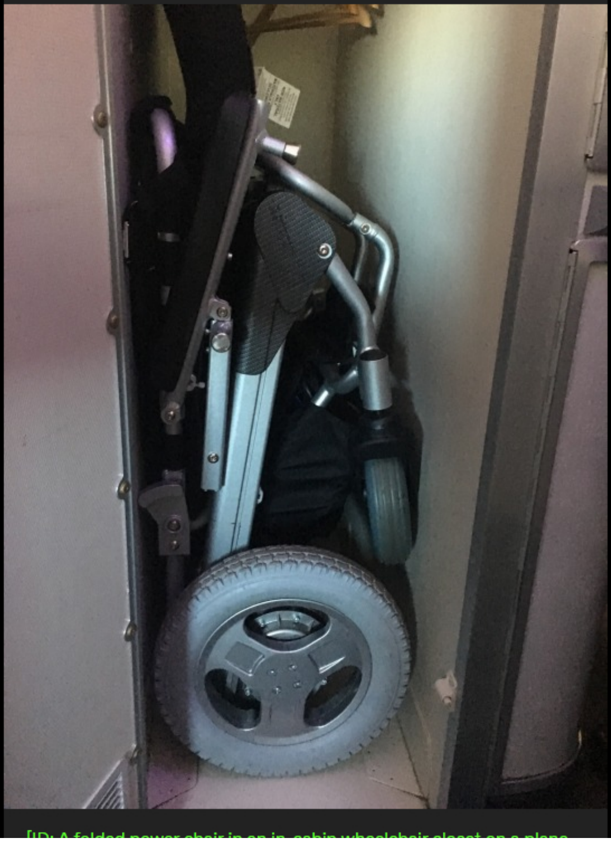
Have you checked to see if your folding power chair will fit in the in-cabin wheelchair closet? These are required by law on any US flight with more than 100 seats, and are often quite large. Even the smallest in-cabin wheelchair closet will take many folding power chairs. (Don't ask the gate agents and flight attendants if it will fit - they have no idea and will always say no anyway. Check the measurements yourself and then be ready to debate like a lawyer every time you fly because they will not want to move their personal bags out of the wheelchair closet to make room for an actual wheelchair.)

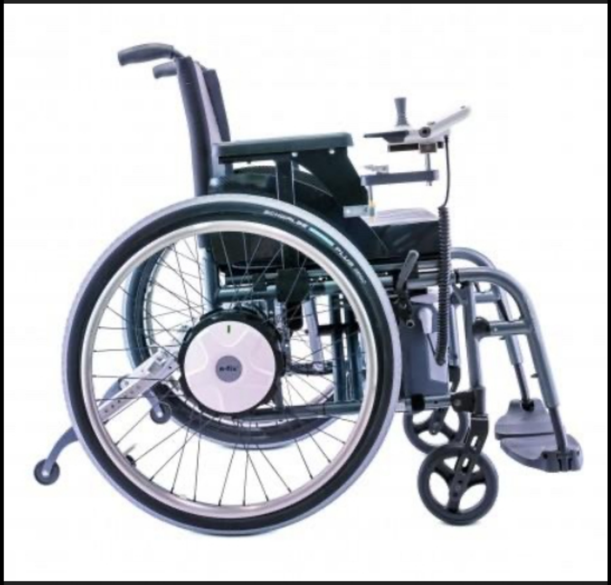


[ID: A folded power chair in an in-cabin wheelchair closet on a plane

[ID: A folded power chair in an in-cabin wheelchair closet on a plane. There's an empty coat hanger hanging above it.]

That's an EZLite Cruiser DX12 in the smallest allowable in-cabin wheelchair closet. All in-cabin wheelchair closets must legally be at least that big. Many are significantly larger

An even better option if a bit more expensive is a folding manual chair with a joystick-driven power add-on. You can get rehab seating on a good manual chair making them a much better option for many disabled people, they're more powerful than a folding powerchair, and the airline can't argue that they don't have to put it in the in-cabin wheelchair closet because it's not a manual chair. (The ACAA is a bit less clear on the topic of power chairs than it is on manual ones.)



[ID: Photo 1: A stock photo of a wheelchair with an Alber E-Fix power add-on. You can see the power wheels with grey tires and the joystick have been added to a standard manual chair, turning it into a power chair. Photo 2: A wheelchair with grey tires is folded and stowed in an in-cabin wheelchair closet on an airplane. A red bag is stuffed next to it. A row of empty coat hangers are hanging above it.]

Yes there are workarounds that some powerchair users can use to fly while lowering the risk of our wheelchairs being damaged. The least risky ones involve stowing your chair in the cabin of the plane where the airline has fewer opportunities to damage it. However these options aren't available to all power chair users, many of whom require the functionality of a full size power chair. And also, we shouldn't have to have a second "special" power chair just for flying. We shouldn't have to jump though hoops, spend money out the nose for a second, less functional wheelchair and then still have to hope the airline will let us fly and not break our wheelchairs. What American Airlines is doing here is straight up discrimination.

The second power chair gets used much more than the first because I can get it in and out of my car by myself, which I couldn't with my folding manual, which was heavier and had a worse form factor for that. Getting the big wheelchair in and out of the car is a nightmare that usually ends up with me having minor injuries, my van is not modified so we use a ramp and the thing is fussy about fitting and with the lightweight I can just pop the sucker in behind the driver's seat without folding or fussing or ramps at all.

I didn't mind gate checking it--because it's light, it meant that they loaded it last and unloaded it first so it was fine.

But I agree. People should not need extra wheelchairs just for travel.

I have add-on leg supports for the lightweight power chair but they nearly doubled the weight of the thing and cut down the battery life. For me, with my disability level, the lightweight chair is actually more essential to function than the heavy chair for now, but that may change if I become more dependent on wheelchairs inside the house.

I would love to see them come up with a lightweight rehab chair. 434 pounds for a chair is just so much.

She always could see them no matter how small or tall. "It's a phase", her parents had said and disregarded the tales their child told as mere fantasy. "There are no monsters!", her mother said when tucking her in and she wondered why mom couldn't see the clock's toothy smile or how the window drapes were grasping at everyone. She convinced her parents to at least leave her a night light. They grudgingly did. The night helped a little, forcing the smile to be less toothy and leery gobelins to be less leery. Over time she learned to understand the Others, to even regard them as an ally of sorts. More important; she learnt the rules.

When she discovered gardening, little did her parents know she meant to protect them by planting soothing herbs, trying to kit their broken relationship. Then, one day, her mother vanished. It was after the girl had yelled at her to go away. THEY had heard and helped in THEIR own way. Her father was distraught. Even more so when his daughter began saying she caused it all.

She ran away when doctors tried to "cure" her from seeing THEM. She found Elsewhere University and enrolled, finding a new name; Sage.

So people are trying to restore the passenger pigeon, or more aptly a genetically congruous facsimile created through breeding and genetic modification of extant pigeon species. Don't get me wrong, I'm super excited by the idea of having the passenger pigeon darken our skies again in the US. But there's a sort of less obvious issue to the idea that I'm not sure species revival supporters have anticipated fully.

When the passenger pigeon flew over North America pre-European settlement, it did so in flocks of billions. They would appear as a cloud almost, blocking out the sun, and causing incredible ecological disturbance presumably wherever they landed. This is not a bad thing, in fact I wish I could have seen this because it must have been magnificent. What's worrisome is that no ecological parallel exists today to what existed then.

I have to wonder if we introduce something genetically similar to the passenger pigeon if it would even be able to survive in anything approaching 1% of their original numbers. We don't even know if their primary dietary sources are still extant or existing in the numbers necessary to support their populations. Where once there was a hole left by their disappearance, there is now a broad chasm created by the shear lack of habitat. The poor extinct pigeon simply does not have biological relevance to current US landscapes where ecosystems services are concerned. In fact, they may end up the newest ecological disaster if we did successfully restore them.

It makes much more sense to invest in protecting the resources we have and expanding them, so one day we can look at replacing some of the genetic diversity that was destroyed.

The same thing goes for other species preposed as candidates for "de-extinction" like Mammoths, DoDos, Thylacines etc. The habitats these species once lived in have been changed since they left this earth, both by human intervention (rats, pigs, dogs for the previous habitat of the DoDo, for example) and natural processes. Even if we did bring back Mammoths, they wouldn't have the huge plains of tundra grasses they need. Not to mention they'd be slaughtered for their ivory on the Chinese black market, just as their cousins are today. We should work to protect what we still have, not try to get back what we lost. A de-extinction'd species wouldn't be restoring an ecosystem, It'd be a novelty, an attraction.

Tea Storage Jar, Nonomura Ninsei, mid- to late 1600s, Cleveland Museum of Art: Japanese Art

After studying ceramics in the Seto and Awataguchi areas, Ninsei returned to his birthplace, Kyoto, where he established a kiln near the gates of the Buddhist temple Ninnaji. In Japan's medieval era, ceramicists did not sign their works; however, Ninsei placed his seal on his ceramics, an unprecedented action that was decidedly modern for the time. Although he is best known for elaborately glazed and painted works, this tea storage jar, its shape known as a tsubo, is left simple and mostly undecorated. It is a Shigaraki utsushi—a work inspired by the shapes of Shigaraki ware but potted with refined Kyoto methods and using clay from the capital. It would have suited a tea master interested in a rustic yet polished aesthetic.

Rebecca: I started to think about all the hero stories where the climax is a fight—fighting for what you believe in. These stories never really grapple with the fact that being in a fight is really unhealthy for a person, even when you win. I feel like if you grow up watching movies, you might think that there's nothing better in the world than being in a fight and winning, but being in a fight can really be difficult for you physically, emotionally, and developmentally. Steven's been through a lot, and he came out victorious, but he took a lot of damage.

The end of "Change Your Mind" is the conclusion that Steven needs to reach; he's so relieved and excited to be himself, and he loves being himself so much. But that takes maintenance; there's not a eureka moment when you suddenly love yourself forever. I wanted to talk about how even afterward you have to work to maintain a healthy relationship with yourself. So Future is about him really hitting a breaking point and realizing that he needs to prioritize himself. His relationship with himself is as important, if not more important, than all the other positive relationships in his life.

I love this show, man. I have literally never watched another show or movie that has tackled such deep and important concepts in a way that is both easy to consume and hard to swallow. As someone with heavy social anxiety, it's something that I really have to remind myself of, as well. The relationship you have with yourself is just as important, if not more important, than all pf your other positive relationships. Loving and prioritizing yourself is so important.

Unicorns Exist: How to appropriately talk about bottom surgery.

This post is mainly about phallo, because let's face facts, people bad mouth phallo the majority of the time, but meta should be taken into account as well.

1. Use "I" statements when talking about your feelings. Meaning saying something such as "I dislike this particular surgery technique", or "I prefer this surgeon". This is important because the decision to have bottom surgery and which surgery you choose is about what is best for you.
2. Take into account that the results you are seeing are often not finished. It's important to be aware that a lot of the result photos on surgeons websites are those of a first stage surgery, or a very newly constructed phallus. That means the surgery is not completed and the surgical site is often still swollen.
3. Remember you are talking about a person. That's right, a person. These aren't just floating genitals, there is a real person attached. A person who has feelings and made an important and informed decision regarding what they needed in order to make their body feel whole. And while it's unlikely they will happen upon a post discussing their personal results, stating horrible opinions about bottom surgery that those who have had bottom surgery or are seriously considering bottom surgery may read, can be shaming and are always hurtful.
4. If you don't know what you are talking about, don't talk about it. This one is important. If you have not done research on the subject of bottom surgery, don't spread information about it, especially if such information is something you heard from a "friend of a friend of a guy who had bottom surgery". It's likely false and far-fetched.
5. Remember that saying "no offense" or "in my opinion" does not mean you cannot be held accountable. Just because you specify that you don't mean to offend anyone with your words or that something is only your opinion does not absolve you from taking responsibility for your words. While negative remarks about bottom surgery may be your actual opinion that doesn't mean they are any less hurtful because they are "just your opinion." You genuinely may not have meant what you said to be offensive, but not everyone has the same views on bottom surgery as you do and hurtful remarks can and will hurt them.

6. Don't assume or judge people's priorities for bottom surgery.
a) If someone tells you he's getting meta because he doesn't want to risk erotic sensation and/or he wants a lesser invasive surgery and/or he doesn't want a skin graft and/or whatever other reason, don't "counter" with a way (or ways) that phallo is "better suited" to acheive some other goal(s), whatever that/those may be. Meta's merits stand on their own, they aren't conditional on how they stack up against phallo's merits and vice versa. b) if someone tells you he's decided on X donor site for his phallo, don't "counter" with how some other donor site is "better" with regards to sensation/visiblity of scarring/size/number of surgeries/etc. The reasons that someone uses to solidify their choice of donor site are valid in and of themselves. They don't mean they are true for all and everyone should get the same donor site. Maybe it's to do with cost/insurance coverage, medical health history (that render other techniques impossible/less optimal), maybe it's about them having totally different priorities them whichever one you have. There's no "better" priority to have with one's genitals. There's what works best for each of us in our individual lives and circumstances. No matter what some surgeons with fancy pants letters following their names published in however many distinguished medical journals insist: there is no singular gold standard. Thankfully some surgeons are starting to recognise that but this change in discourse should come from within the trans community reclaiming our right to set the tone and ways in which we discuss our bodies (instead of appropriating cis centric for profit/career advancement discourse.)

7. There are times and places to ask post-bottom-op guys about their genitals. You know if you're at a bottom surgery show and tell and when you're not; don't dismiss that knowledge. Even if it is the only time in your life you may meet a particular person doesn't suddenly make it a good time for him. Just because you're interacting in a trans forum (IRL or online) doesn't automatically mean it's Q&A time. You're asking someone to talk about their genitals outside of a sexy context and as though it's strictly a surgeon's work/surgical result. Consider this an extension of point 3, it can be dehumanising and demoralising.

8. Remember that genitals do not equal gender identity or assigned sex at birth!

Someone might have been assigned female at birth, but they do not necessarily still identify as female or have a vagina. This is one of the basic trans 101 lessons that we try to explain to cisgender allies, but it seems to be something that some of our trans brethren overlook just as often.

Saying "genitals do not equal gender" doesn't just mean "Some men have vaginas," but also means "Some people actively choose to get surgery to have a pensi without identifying as male".

Truscum in particular often try to make trans men who don't want surgery feel that they should want to/need to get bottom surgery, and simultaneously dismiss non-binary people who do want surgery as being "transtrenders" who are taking resources away from the men who need them and will regret their surgery.

This helps nether group; surgery is a major decision and it isn't necessary to be a man, and invaliding trans men who choose not to get surgery is both cruel and pushes them towards feeling like they need a procedure that they don't want, which is what does cause regret, while harassing a non-binary person out of a procedure that they genuinely need won't save them from regret, it's just harassing them.

All of this nonsense makes some of the post-op community seem foreboding to non-binary folks, but many non-binary people, including myself, choose to pursue lower surgery and have experienced a lot of support from other post-op folks too. The haters often just shout louder when you're online, but if you can find the right spaces you'll find support. Having a penis or wanting a penis doesn't turn someone into a male if they do not identify as a man. And another thing that's overlooked: there's also more than one way to get bottom surgery, and having a penis doesn't mean you can't also have a vagina!

Dismissing the lived realities of many, many intersex and post-op transmasculine people is sadly the norm in "discourse" (especially in discourse posted by TERFs), and when someone points out that knowing if someone was AFAB and/or is TME has nothing to do with what genitals that person has today, and that that lower surgery exists, people often rush to justify their statements by either pivoting to numbers or invaliding the person's body entirely.

The pivot to numbers typically takes the form of someone claiming that "being post-op is rare in the transgender community so it's okay to equate genitals with assigned sex at birth!" which... isn't a hot take.

Being transgender is rare if you look at the general population of the world (possibly around 2.7% of the population), but that doesn't mean that using gender-inclusive language isn't important.

Similarly, being post-op is somewhat uncommon in the general population of trans people (possibly around 5% of the transmasculine population), but that doesn't justify using language or arguments that ignores and erases our existence.

Invalidation often takes the form of emphasizing the "surgical" nature of the body part, with the implication that it is not a real and valid part of their body if it was surgically created. This tends to come hand in hand with value-judgements proclaiming how cisgender genitals are superior and "natural" while transgender post-op genitals are lacking and inferior.

Of course it's also important to remember that cisgender people (often disabled/chronically ill people, people who were in accidents or experienced a trauma, and intersex people) can have genitals that have been operated on or are otherwise atypical/non-standard, and this does not mean that their bodies are inherently undesirable as a result. There are cisgender men who have had urethroplasty as a result of trauma or erectile implants placed as a result of erectile dysfunction, for example, and their surgeries are identical to those of transmasculine people. Indeed, there are even cisgender men who have gotten phalloplasty, typically after they suffered trauma to the penis that resulted in amputation.

All bodies are good bodies, and transgender bodies are not any lesser than anyone else's, even if they are not identical to the average cisgender person's in every way possible. This doesn't mean that a transgender person's dysphoria is invalid or that it's wrong to want to have a body that does match the cis stereotype, but it is a fact that there are some things that our bodies currently can't do, like produce sperm, and we have to come to terms with this and find a way to cope with it because that is something we can't change yet. And healthy methods of coping, like radical acceptance, don't typically involve putting down your body and saying that it's lesser than someone else's.

And being supportive to people who are struggling with that kind of dysphoria means not being an asshole about it or bringing in words with a negative connotation, which brings us to the next point...

9. Use respectful language!

I've heard people say everything ranging from "plastic surgery dick" to "non-functional flesh tube" to describe the body parts of people who have gotten phalloplasty.

You might wonder "What should you should call someone's penis then?" and the answer is "Call it their penis." Unless they've specifically told you they prefer a different term that they find more sexy/gender-affirming, don't use words to refer to transmasculine people's penises that you wouldn't use to refer to a cisgender man's penis. It's that simple. A penis is a penis, regardless of whether it has ever been operated on.

If you want to indicate that the penis was created through surgery (for some reason that hopefully isn't transphobic) and accordingly want to use another descriptor in addition to penis/cock/dick/[insert slang here] to indicate that the penis was created by surgery, you could say "a penis created by phalloplasty" or "a penis created by metoidioplasty" or "a penis created through genital reassignment surgery" depending on the context.

Transmasculine people who undergo bottom surgery face a lot of stigma, and in my experience, the most negative and dismissive comments I've heard have been from o*ther transmasculine people.* It isn't okay to body shame other people, and even though that may not be the intent behind this type of language (often people are bitter themselves about not being able to have the ideal congruent genitals of their dreams), it still ends up making people who need this surgery feel worse about their genitals.

It's also important to think about what the message you're saying is. If someone is posting about how they feel like their body is unattractive and ugly because they're fat, then even if the root of the emotion is self-hatred and they're letting out their frustration, they're also telling all the other fat people who see the post that they too are ugly and undesirable for being fat so the person might want to think about their internalized fatphobia.

Similarly, if someone is saying that they think phallo-created penises are ugly/unattractive/etc, they might be venting because they feel dysphoric about their current body and feel like the surgical options available aren't adequate enough to fix their dysphoria or satisfy their longing for a congruent body, but the message they're actually sending to other post-op people is that their penises are ugly/unattractive/etc.

You might be thinking "Well, I'm just venting!" and yes, it's okay to vent! But you have to be careful about the way you word your public posts. If you don't think you can word them respectfully while still letting your anger/disappointment/dysphoria/etc out, then don't make it public and stick it in the trans hashtag where others will come across it and be invalidated and/or triggered; you can post privately on Tumblr for a reason.

10. Consider what needs to happen to create an accepting community that post-op people can feel safe and supported in

There have always been transmasculine who choose to undergo phalloplasty and metoidioplasty, and the number of people getting these surgeries is only increasing over time. Increased insurance coverage through the slow removal of policy exclusions for transgender care is making it a financial possibility for an greater number of people, more surgeons are training to perform the operations and more hospitals are establishing transgender surgical programs to increase the number of providers who are willing to perform the procedure and improve access to the procedures, and advances in surgical techniques are gradually reducing the rate of complications involved with the surgeries.

Yet awareness is not growing in the broader transmasculine community about how to respectfully and non-dismissively discuss someone's post-op genitals even as record numbers of transmasculine people are getting these surgeries.

Why? It's partially a negative feedback loop; people who have had metoidioplasty or phalloplasty often encounter both misinformation and negativity about the result of their surgeries from pre-op and non-op people which means they're less likely to feel comfortable disclosing that they had surgery in a general transmasculine space, and prefer to save their vulnerability for the emotionally safer communities comprised of other post-op people.

This means that there are fewer people who are actively engaging with and and educating the rest of the folks who are not interested in getting surgery themselves, and as a result the negativity and dismissive comments are allowed to flourish unchecked without the experience and perspective of post-op people who can explain how create body-positive safe spaces that include the entire community.

Because there's so many people who aren't sensitive to the needs of and issues faced by the post-op community, it also creates a pressure for post-op people to present only the positives about their experience.

While seeing the full timeline of healing photos can be an important educational resource for someone who is considering surgery or preparing for surgery and want to know what to expect, when someone posts a picture showing their body recently post-op from stage one and are rewarded with comments about how their body looks "bad" or "unrealistic" it discourages folks from sharing any pictures from any stage of their recovery at all.

Similarly, when people spread misinformation about how many people regret surgery as an attempt to dissuade others from people regret surgery as an attempt to dissuade others from pursuing the surgery they need, transmasculine people who are dealing with post-op depression or who are experiencing mixed feelings about the often traumatizing process of multiple surgeries/complications/recoveries worry that if they are open about their experience their words might be cherry-picked to contribute to the misconception that many people regret getting surgery.

When we push post-op people out of the transmasculine community, we all lose something.

for #transawarenessweek i thought i'd share a rambling of my journey towards self love 🖤

i knew i was "different" from a young age but as a kid, your vocabulary is so limited that you associate yourself to things that are similar. i always wanted to be the knight in shining armor, never the princess. i wanted boys clothes and toys. i loved being socially thrown in with the boys. but if i couldn't be one of them, being a tomboy was just as good.

when i was 11/12, i heard the word "gay" for the first time and saw people who were just as masculine/tomboy-ish as me and i thought i finally found my place to fit in. but calling myself a lesbian always felt weird. lol probably should've realized then that you shouldn't cringe at your own identity. i was bullied at school about it for a few years. i denied it as much as possible and that's probably when i stopped being open. i didn't tell people when things hurt. i tried telling someone from church that i thought i was gay and they were positive god wouldn't make me like that. my relationship with religion changed after that. i just wanted to be accepted as i was even if it meant i was different than everyone else by college, i had suppressed a lot. i didn't date in high school, i ended up being a good choice as a friend but nothing more than that. i blossomed a little bit though, finally being around other young queer people, i didn't put so much pressure on myself to necessarily conform. finally got my first girlfriend so i guess it went well lol but eventually, i fell back into a rut of questioning who i was. my family expected a certain life for me and i felt like a failure for betraying that image.

one day, i went to youtube and typed in "girls wanting to be boys" just to see what would come up and that's when i saw @skylarkergil and @alionsfear 's videos about transitioning. there were others too, guys like me who had the same uneasiness about their bodies and puberty and being associated as a woman. who also didn't think lesbian fit them. so i was 21 when transgender was added into my vocabulary.

i told maybe two people but worried i was trying to force myself into the identity. everyone online seemed to know when they were 2 years old that they were boys and here i was, in my twenties just figuring out that was a possibility for me.

it took seven years after seeing those first videos (and moving across country) to be able to start hormones, to have people refer to me with he/his/him pronouns, and for me to be comfortable enough to be open with people. i'm finally living authentically as myself with supportive people around me. i still have a lot of growth to do but i haven't regretted starting this transition once.

most of all, i just wanted and needed to say thank you to every single one of you that has liked my posts. being trans can be hard especially when youre spending so much energy trying to pass or even getting something as simple as your license changed, but it's such a great feeling of relief to see any kind of support 🖤 thanks for being there for me even if we don't talk on a regular basis or i forget to message you back. just liking and acknowledging that ive posted something like this reminds me that i'm loved and supported even from afar. love you guys and thanks for enduring this long ted talk about my life 😂🥰🏳️⚧

Well… since a thread blew up on twitter about me being a lesbian I thought I'd officially just reintroduce myself to those of you who don't know. My name's Becky. I created this blog when I was 13 with the help of a few girls. Honestly, it was a joke that kind of blew up. Somehow I brought joy to girls and boys all across the world ("justgirlythings" but literally any man or woman could laugh/relate to this blog) and that's all I really could've asked for when creating this. The above picture is me and my fiancée Chelsi.

I'd like to thank you all for coming along on this journey with me for the past decade.

Reasons I have seen webcomic authors publicly cite for cancelling their comic mid-storyline:

- Too busy
- Lost interest
- Increasing age gap between characters and author made it difficult to relate
- Did the math and figured out that completing the planned arc with their current update schedule would take 150 years
- Ostensible author actually a fictional persona that's now being retired, and they didn't want the comic linked to their real identity
- Realised that the way they'd written the central relationship wasn't emotionally genuine (note: this was a hobbit porn comic)
- The comic's readership contained too many lesbians
- Converted to a religion that regards all representational art as a form of idolatry
- Broke up with the person the protagonist was based on
- Outed as not actually Japanese
- Imprisoned for manslaughter
- Aliens

Dogor is the 18,000 year old pup that was found within the Siberian Permafrost, yet is not quite a dog nor a wolf, but a puzzling connection to both.

Dogor has been miraculously preserved within the permafrost, with its fur, teeth and even whiskers incredibly intact. Radiocarbon dating has placed the animal at 18,000 years old and researchers have suggested that the animal passed away at just 2 months old. The name Dogor means "Friend" in Yakut, a language spoken within Eastern Siberia.

Generally, genetic analysis can quite easily discern whether a discovered canine is a wolf or dog, but in this instance, the genetics suggest that it could be an ancestral link to both. Interestingly, Dogor lived at a time in canine evolutionary history when dogs and wolves began to branch off from each other.The general scientific consensus is that dogs and wolves split from a common ancestor, however, the process of how "dogs became dogs" is certainly contested, and Dogor could be a crucial piece in that puzzle.

If Dogor is determined to be a dog, it will be the oldest ever discovered. The next oldest, the Bonn-Oberkassel puppy, was discovered in Germany and was clearly determined to be a dog of around 14,000 years old, buried with a man and a woman.

The progression of climate change is melting the permafrost more rapidly, and discoveries like these are becoming more and more commonplace.

Why is Democratic control of the Senate important?

- It would be much easier to make policy on key issues like healthcare, LGBTQ rights, climate change, tax policy, immigration, and economic recovery. You want Biden to be able to pursue progressive policies? Control of the Senate would be a major boost.
- Biden's legislative and international agenda is majorly compromised if the Senate becomes a stalling point. Avoiding legislative gridlock is crucial to getting things done in general, and particularly to manage the pandemic and start undoing the damage Trump's administration has done.
- The Senate confirms senior government appointees to the administration - this affects Biden's ability to pick his Cabinet and appoint judges.
- If the Democrats are able to gain control of all three offices, they can change the filibuster, making it much more difficult for Republicans to block measures.
- Conversely, if the Senate is the only chamber that Republicans retain control of, there's a major possibility that Republicans will use it to be purposely obstructive to progressive policies, just because they're progressive and also because it's in their interest to make a Biden presidency as ineffective as possible.

also with all due respect the main reason the left loses so much is that y'all refuse to compromise on the language and messaging you use to speak to voters. i swear if you rebranded "defund the police" as "invest in community safety from the ground up" most white suburban moderates would be like "that sounds great" and i know that because that's how i've literally reframed it to white suburban moderates who think "defund the police" means we're going to live in a scary lawless mad max world

like maybe it comes across as mealy-mouthed and corny to people steeped in online cynicism but just to be clear, this is the country that wouldn't eat french fries after 9/11 so we renamed them "freedom fries" and everyone was suddenly cool again. americans are not, by and large, super sophisticated about this stuff

okay, so, as a followup.... basically, i joined this "christians against trump" fb group for a work research project in 2017 and just ended up never leaving, bc it turned out to be such a great experiment in just... observing and listening and talking to people and figuring out the language that works! so like, as a basic glossary for talking to the well-meaning anti-trump moderate dems in your life about progressive policies:

- instead of "defund the police," say "invest in community safety" and emphasize things like participatory budgeting giving you power over where YOUR taxes go and reallocating funds to after-school programs, social services, and food pantries
- instead of "abolish ice," say "immigration reform" and "create a new agency for immigration and citizenship services"
- instead of "medicare for all," say "universal health care" or even just really harp on making healthcare affordable and accessible to everyone
- instead of "the green new deal" (which was a great piece of messaging in the first place before it became inextricably tied up with aoc's theatrics), talk about what an effective piece of climate legislation will create, not what it will destroy. when you say "ban fracking" or "ban fossil fuels" or "reduce methane emissions in agriculture" people go "YOU WON'T TAKE MY JOB OR MY FARTING COWS." climate is really an area where being able to reframe it through the language of capitalism helps. say "let's give tax breaks to farmers, especially small family farms who are already being squeezed out by the big guys, so they can invest in the future of their business" and other noise-shaped air stuff like that. instead of "ban fracking" talk about the jobs that renewable energy will create in communities that have been left behind by our reliance on foreign oil. i mean, fuck, the phrase "climate change" can be a real problem when you're talking to the whole country because of how effective the "climate and weather are the same things" and "climate change is a hoax" disinfo campaigns have been over the past 20 years or so - but when you talk about "conserving our natural resources" and all that teddy roosevelt, ranger rick shit, it just comes across different.
- instead of "abortion rights".... listen, you know i hate equivocating about abortion but at the end of the day, when you're talking to people who are probably anti-abortion for religious reasons but will still vote democrat because they're not a single-issue anti-abortion voter, don't say "abortion (on demand without apology etc)," say "the constitutional right to privacy" or "the right to make personal medical decisions without the government intervening." fearmonger about attacks on abortion the way sarah palin fearmongered about how obamacare would lead to "death panels" deciding whether your grandma would live or die! and if you're talking to someone who just doesn't feel that strongly about abortion because yada yada roe is settled who cares, talk about how "empowering women to decide when they start a family fuels economic growth and leads to more wanted children growing up in stable, happy two-parent homes" and so

- instead of "democratic socialism," just talk about, like, values - ending poverty and hunger, living wages and better educational opportunities, creating jobs and protecting ordinary working people and families and putting money back in their pockets and creating a stable economy. people really do vote based on kitchen table issues and you can really make a moral appeal on the rest.
- instead of "tax the rich," say "cut taxes." period. never talk about raising taxes. not on the rich, not on the middle class, not for any reason whatsoever, even if you're saying "if we raise taxes on billionaires we can give everyone a pony." i don't care how much you want to tax billionaires, don't fucking bring it up. i hate bezos as much as everyone but we live in america, where everyone is simply a temporarily embarrassed billionaire and convinced that taxing the ultra-rich will somehow hurt them too. don't expect middle-of-the-road normies to get on board with the "i'll pay more taxes if it means other people have health care" thing you see from avowed liberals and lefties, because they will not, i'm sorry. frankly i have no interest in paying more taxes because nyc already taxes you out the nose regardless of where you are on the socioeconomic scale and if someone suggested i should pay more, even if it meant paying less on private services in the long run, i would simply be like, "nope!" so like, yeah, obviously the goal is to eliminate corporate tax loopholes and tax the ultra-rich at a higher rate while cutting tax burdens on everyone else, but what you want to say is stuff like "small business owners shouldn't pay more in taxes than the companies like apple and amazon that are already squeezing them out" and "we'll cut taxes and frivolous government spending," period, no embellishment. "making american companies pay american taxes" is a succinct catchphrase i like to use.
- instead of "defund/spend less on the military," say "why is the government spending so much on building outdated outdated tanks and submarines from 50 years ago and so little on services for veterans? we need to revitalize our military spending so that we can spend less on safer, more modern equipment, preserve those manufacturing jobs, and make sure that veterans get the health care and job opportunities they deserve." get it? like, republicans have been selling the "cut waste, cut taxes, cut spending" line for decades because it sounds good and people really respond to it. unfortunately, one of the many cursed legacies of ronald reagan is that most people still think that balancing a government budget is like balancing a checkbook, and obviously that's not true but it lends a lot of familiar comparisons and metaphors, so like... use them.
- don't equivocate on "black lives matter" - it's too important and too urgent - instead, give the non-activist liberals you already know the accessible language they can use to help normalize the phrase "black lives matter" in their own lives and encourage them to do so. they won't convert the full-on blue lives matter cult members and other assorted balls-to-the-wall racists, but there are people in the middle who just need to hear a targeted explanation of why that isn't a combative or controversial statement, and that totally depends on the individual... there's the very basic 101-logicky "if saying 'save the whales' doesn't mean you think dolphins can kick rocks, or if saying 'spinach is a vegetable' doesn't mean that you think lettuce isn't, why does 'black lives matter' imply that other lives don't?" and i saw someone in the christians against trump group cite a brene brown quote they said ("In order for slavery to work, in order for us to buy, sell, beat, and trade people like animals, Americans had to completely dehumanize slaves. And whether we directly participated in that or were simply a member of a culture that at one time normalized that behavior, it shaped us. We can't undo that level of dehumanizing in one or two generations. I believe Black Lives Matter is a movement to rehumanize black citizens. All lives matter, but not all lives need to be pulled back into moral inclusion. Not all people were subjected to the psychological process of demonizing and being made less than human so we could justify the inhumane practice of slavery.") that made it click for them and they like to use to make it click for others, and there's also this example that i think is probably pretty resonant for christians:

Our pastor had a great message that many people responded to. The crux of it was, yes, biblically, we believe all lives matter. That's what God's kingdom looks like. We're called to bring that about.

Now, how do we know if we 'matter?' We know we matter if we are able to have our basic needs met. If we're able to feel safe and loved by our community, etc., then she went on to outline the historical discrimination that makes this difficult for people of color, and this is why we have to assert that black lives matter right now- because we have to do the kingdom work to address those issues till we can demonstrate that they do, indeed, matter.

I'm not saying she tipped the angry hardliners, but many others communicated to her that it helped them understand. The thing is the hardliners who love to spout off online are probably never gonna listen.

the point is, as with all the rest of this, that there are a lot of people out there who are alienated by the language (because there has been a billion-dollar media propaganda machine working overtime to make the language as alienating as possible) but not by the content of the argument. the right is SO good at messaging to its base by speaking their language, dog whistles and all. but because the democratic party is a coalition of moderates and liberals and leftists, you really have to be strategic about your messaging in a way that the right doesn't. frankly, that's why joe biden won - he made those same broad appeals to morality and civility and unity and prosperity that people want to hear.

i realize that everyone feels that if you have the moral high ground, you shouldn't have to put in work to persuade people because they should automatically grasp that you're right, but like i said above, this is america, and it doesn't work like that. we need to talk to people, not in buzzwords or in highly stigmatized language that risks turning them off immediately, but in language that already means something to them. if you want to persuade people you have to actually make things sound appealing to them, whether that means evoking warm and fuzzy mental images or appealing to their principles and moral convictions and religious beliefs or just doing your best to sound like the adults in the room. you gotta do this stuff to build a majority instead of just a plurality within this party, because that's just what we need to win.

If you want to see this side of the argument in action: witness Dan Price on Fox News reframing Universal Basic Income as "taking money out of the government and putting it in the hands of everyday Americans," which is just. chef's kiss Speaking as someone raised by and around conservatives, they will eat that shit UP.

so I've just been made aware of this image from 1926

it's a bunch of women in clothing from different earlier eras reacting to an extremely modish flapper. like, more extreme even than most fashionable women of the period were willing to go

Miss 1917 on the far right seems to be showing distinct interest. bordering on horniness. Miss 1917 needs a cold shower, is what I'm saying from left to right, it looks like:

- late Victorian? maybe 1910s? (skirt's too short to go with the hat if it is meant to be Victorian- could be sporting-wear, a later skirt standing in, or something that originally belonged to a smaller woman)

- earlier in the ‘20s? some weird attempt at 18th century, based on the makeup? I’ve got nothing for this one. honestly the dress looks almost 1930s to me, except the sleeves are a bit late 1890s-ish?

- 1910-ish

- 1905-ish

- around 1917

I love this so much. I love that they seem to have dug up “vintage” clothes- including the necessary undergarments, for the outfits that require specific corsets. I love the varied expressions, ranging from horror to scorn to curiosity

(personally, I’m right there with the unimpressed Gibson Girl type. “ugh, girl, seriously? you look like you’re wearing a pillowcase. no thanks.”) humans have been thinking about how their ancestors would react to the present forever. we really never change

Y'all, I'm just…so so happy.

I'm 35 years old and I've never seen a Barbie that looked like me, and then there I am as a Barbie in a purple sweater with thick thighs and evenly proportioned boobs and pink hair and a cat.

I can only imagine how other girls must feel.

Nicely done, Mattel. Nicely done!

immaplatypus Follow

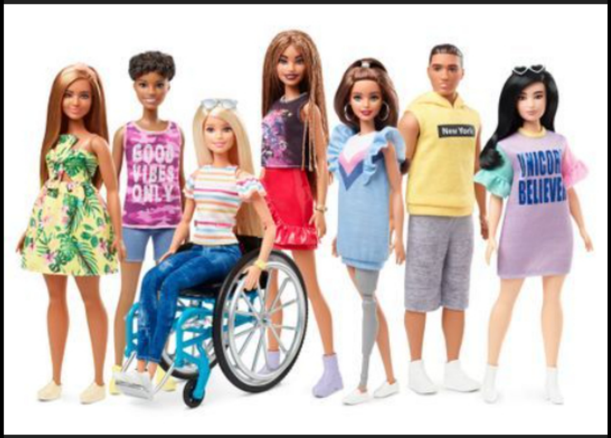
Mattel also just announced some new Barbie dolls who have wheelchairs or prosthetic limbs!!!



Like screw anything calling this "politically correct," this is what the real world literally is.  And the world's population of children is just as diverse as its adults.  Kids deserve to see themselves represented.  As a disabled person myself, I can't tell you how much this would have meant to me as a little girl.

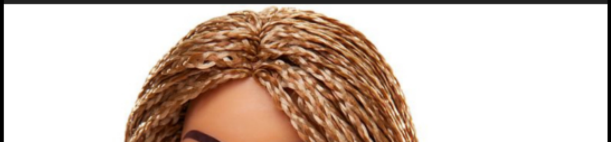
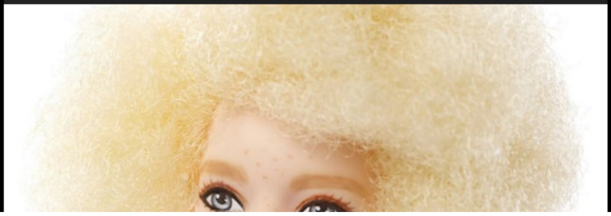
holy shit. I'm like... not even a doll person and so many of these I want!

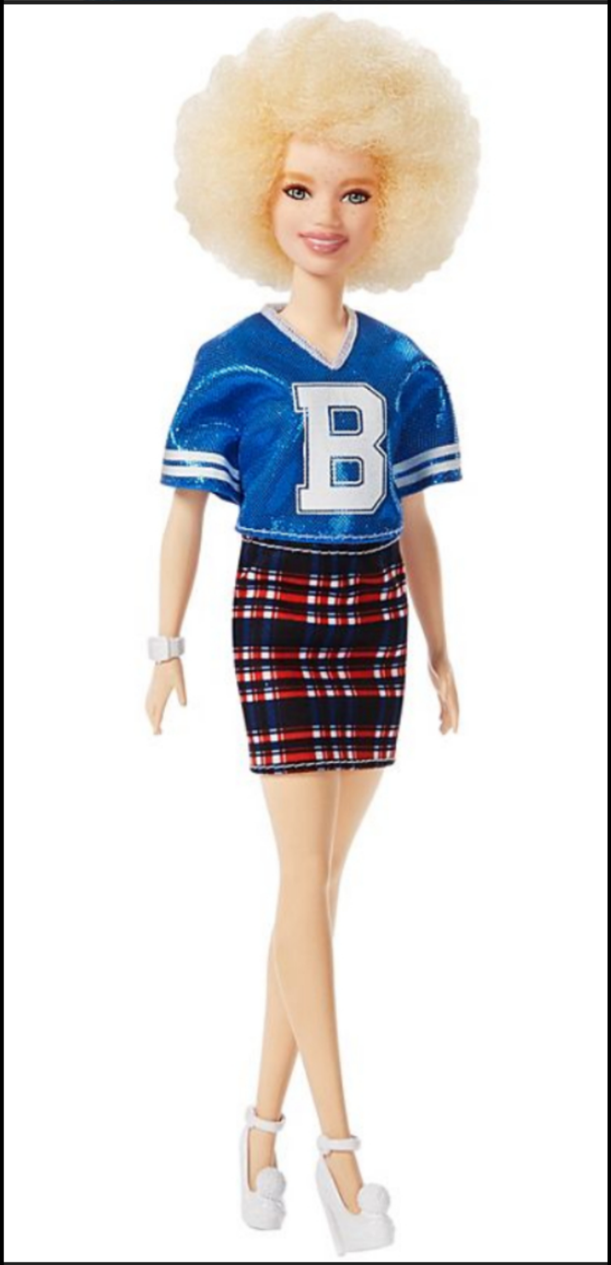
There's LITERALLY too many to add



(who is she?)

Plus sized Barbie with DIMPLES





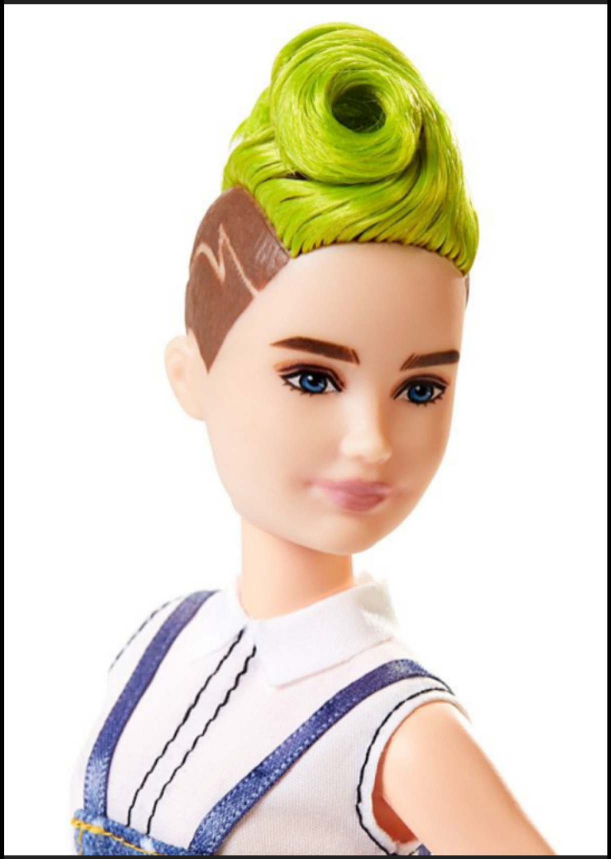
They actually have a barbie with albinism and bothered to give her a proper face-sculpt!

This one looks like she could kill me instantly if she made direct eye-contact

This one’s smile is just KILLING me

Nubian girl because we’re not messing around

Also... this doll does not have any name on the product listing nor on the packaging so this might just be me but.... help me out here guys... is this.. ....is this a non-binary barbie? Am I presuming too much or is that what I'm looking at here??



Also final note. Just to REALLY drill this all home, Barbie has some photos of kids playing with the dolls and Ironically, Barbie did not come to play around.

Also I'm obsessed with this Sally Ride doll

Barbie never played around, barbie played for keeps, why do you think she works so hard in so many fields?

official-lucifers-child Follow

if any of y'all think this is overkill:

i babysat the sweetest little girl who was in a hot pink wheelchair. it was almost brand new, and she was just so excited to finally have a good wheelchair!! the day i walked into the house after she'd gotten it, she wheeled over to me with the biggest smile and said "it doesn't hurt my back anymore!!"

for her birthday, i got her a barbie doll who looked a lot like her (it was the one with vitiligo) and a little barbie wheelchair and a few other accessories because who doesn't like accessories?

apparently she'd had a white doll for a while and of course loved her doll but when she saw not only the one with vitiligo but also the wheelchair? and she put that little doll into the wheelchair and pushed her around a bit on the table? she looked up at me and burst into tears, grinning from ear to ear, and murmured to me "she's like me. i didn't know there were ones like me" and lemme tell you i nearly broke down right then and there and i gave her the warmest smile and hug i could muster up and her parents called me a few months later (i'd stopped babysitting because they didn't have money to pay and wouldn't allow me to babysit for little/free like i offered because i knew they both were searching for jobs and couldn't be around their kid much bc interviews) and they just thanked me. their daughter was “so happy to have a doll like her that she carried the barbie around with her all the time”. they hadn’t been able to afford the doll and were actually saving up for a wheelchair at least.

this is giving kids a doll like themself. this is showing them that they aren’t weird or irregular or not normal. this is showing kids that others who are different from them, others who do have a prosthetic or a wheelchair or dark skin or vitiligo, that those kids aren’t weird. if a little girl sees a barbie in a wheelchair, she’ll just think “oh that’s my friend!!” and be exposed to the fact that these “different” kids are kids too, friends and acquaintances and not people to be mocked or bullied.

enola holmes (2020) really gave us everything: teenage actors playing their actual age which brought a really fun and exciting energy to the film, a black woman schooling an ironically dense detective on the importance of the growing suffrage movement, a sherlock holmes who was portrayed as empathetic and caring rather than cold and calculating, and a clever young protagonist who made history by using her sharp wit and empathy to bring positive change to the oppressive society around her.

at my old job, right before he retired, one of my coworkers said to me, "you know, i knew everything was going to go downhill as soon as companies started renaming the personnel department to human resources."

and i, in the middle of cursing out the shitty old copier, was not prepared for this conversation. "what? why does that matter? it's just a name change."

"name's matter. personnel means they at least acknowledged we were people. human resources means you are given the same consideration and care that goes into the cost benefit analysis of whether we really need new copy machines, or if the old ones are good enough."

and i think about that a lot anyway this is the same man that saw me at pride, introduced me to his husband, bought me a margarita, and did not say one word about the fact i was only wearing a sheer lace dress over a bra and panties at the time

Best Halloween Story Ever

3 YEARS AGO

"I grew up in a college town, and one Halloween our doorbell rang and we opened the door expecting to see trickortreater—but what was in front of our open door—was another door! Like, a full-on wooden door, that had a sign that said “Please knock.” So we did, and the door swung open to reveal a bunch of college dudes dressed as really old grandmothers, curlers in their hair, etc, who proceeded to coo over our “costumes” and tell us we were “such cute trick or treaters!” One even pinched my cheek. Then THEY gave US candy, closed their door, picked it up and walked to the next house."

Look,

The magic spy ring is one of the stupidest and controlling things I have heard. Nasuada made the decision without consulting magicians, assumed someone over powered would lead it and then talked to another non-magical user for their blessing.

The idea is ridiculous due to the fact it includes everyone who has ever had magical talent. That is like keeping watch on every person who has ever picked up any vaguely shaped sword object in case they use their marshal skills to accidently hit someone. There are no structures, there is no written law- just that the government will enforce consequences on anyone doing something with magic that we don't like?

And like, a kid who accidently goes into someone's mind? Someone who heals a wound incorrectly and the person dies? Someone who was taught the wrong method to boil water? Going back to the stick arguement- we don't punish kids for accidently hitting us with sticks while they are playing. It hurts, yes- But we correct them and move on. We do not use government supervision to have them make reparations or swear in the ancient language that they will never pick up a stick again.

Also, you are giving the governmental magicians enormous power and can give them very little oversight. If the government falls, or a magician from the group goes rogue, they will know every single magician out there, from 2 to 90. if that had been a thing before Galbatorix had come to power The Varden would have been screwed.

This isn't making sure another Galbatorix doesn't rise, it is assuring that one will appear That cannot be resisted.

THEY DON'T EVEN INCREASE THIER NUMBERS. (CAUSE WHY DO THAT WHEN YOU CAN SING ABOUT DRAGONS,) bangs head against the wall. It takes a thirty year old with authority problems for them to actually send an actual PeRSon to help. pulls hair

AND THEN THEY HAVE THE AUDACITY TO ACT LIKE THE EGG SHOULD BE THE "ELVES" RespONSIbility?

THE QUEEN DOESN'T EVEN TALK TO THE DAMN AMBASSADOR!

Does that mean the ambassador is better at helping ease the tensions between races?

GIF by jacularmetteld

We wish.

The ambassador gets KIDNAPPED and suddenly there is an EMBARGO and A PRETEEN SHUNNING BY A WOMAN WHO WOULDN'T EVEN TALK TO THE AMBASSADOR.

The logical thought would be that the elves would go get their ambassador. (You know the one taken by the Shade, the being of extraordinary magical talent, BECAUSE AS WE KNOW THE ELVES ARE SUPER GIFTED WITH MAGIC AND STRENGTH AND THEY WERE CHOSEN BY THE DRAGONS.)

NOOOOOOOOO.

The next obvious question would be, are the elves grateful to the fifteen year old?

Sure. They show that by telling him he OWES the Elves and that he isn’t good enough because he is disabled (YOU KNOW DUE TO KILLING THAT SHADE THATS BEEN RUNNING AROUND KILLING YOUR PEOPLE AND CAPTURING AND TORTURING YOUR AMBASSADOR).

THEN (of course) at the end, when the (now) sixteen year old and twenty year old riders have killed the human the elves didn’t- do they respect them?

NOOOOOOOOO.

The elves just take the egg. So it will be “fair.” They even do it while ERagon is gone. like really?

And instead of respecting the fact the riders have to keep themselves separate from individual governments, THEY MAKE THE RIDER THEIR QUEEN. Its certainly not because she’s QUALIFIED. and they “doN’t InhERIte THE CrOwn.”

Their excuse is that they are “diminished” and they need the moral boost. And it is bad that any of the other races have a hold on the other rider, EVEN THOUGH ERAGON TRAINED UNDER THE ELVES, LOOKS LIKE AN ELF, AND FOLLOWS SEVERAL ELVEN PRINCIPLES.

Its only fair that the leader of their race be also above everyone elses government.

IT WAS ONLY THE HUMANS THAT HAD THE PROBLEMS WITH A RIDER BEING IN CHARGE OF EVERYONE.

I am so very glad you loved the cleaning last week, I give it my all to every house.
As far as the water that I took from your sink: with the face mask, gloves, the AC off in your home, it gets very hot. I sweat a lot when cleaning which I have to replace with water, I have to be hydrated because it wouldn't be fun me passing out in your home because of dehydration. Please send your vemno or PayPal for the reimbursement of 32oz of water ( it's 2 cents a gallon )
As far as me coming back again, it seems like we're not a good match. I wish you good

Hey, fun fact! Your peripheral vision is better equipped to see light and movement than when you look at something straight on. Dim light and shadow that would be indistinguishable when facing something can be seen out of the corner of your eye.

So, if you ever see light or movement on the edge of your vision, that suddenly vanishes when you turn, don't worry! Whatever it is hasn't disappeared! You're just unable to perceive it when you're looking right at it!

mklutz Follow

I had a lot of trouble with math as a kid and fell down constantly. After extensive testing, one of the (many, unfortunately) things doctors found was that I straight up did not have peripheral vision. Turns out if you can't see out the sides, you get dyslexia for numbers, aka dyscalculia. I spent three afternoons a week for a whole summer in a dark room staring through a sort of telescope into the floor, with just bright lights and colours in each lens, and they gave me exercises and boom. Eventually, I had peripheral vision.

Which is to say if you want to get better at spotting these monsters it is 100% possible. While I cannot tell you where to get the weird telescope therapy, try this: stretch your arms out in front of you, thumbs together and only your index fingers pointing up. Then slowly, keeping your eyes dead ahead, separate your hands and move them at the same time apart. Stop when they are just at the edge of your peripheral vision.

Every time you do this, staring only straight ahead but perceiving out the sides, you stretch the ability a little, and you should be able to see further and better from the sides until you hit a max.

Good luck hunting demons!

BESP Worlds 2016 Gala Yuzuru Hanyu

"Requiem of Heaven and Earth"

Of all the programs Yuzuru has skated over the years, if you were to ask me "Which program is your favorite?" I'd have to say that my favorite is the World's 2016 version of the "Requiem of Heaven and Earth" EX. It's expressive, raw, and haunting. Yuzuru becomes a conduit for the music, and it's mesmerizing to watch him as the music repeats over-and-over as if stuck in a current. While it's a beautifully constructed program, and I can go on-and-on about the little moments I love, it's a program that's personally significant to Yuzuru himself. Given today's date, I felt it was particularly apt to share it because of those underlying meanings and thoughts that went into the program.

Yuzuru created the Requiem EX for the 2015-16 skating season because it would be 5 years since the Great East Japan Earthquake struck the Tohoku region on March 11th, 2011. *Today marks the 7th anniversary of the disaster. You can read dozens of articles about the earthquake and tsunami which caused massive damage – about 1 million houses damaged or destroyed, almost 16 thousand deaths, thousands more injured, 4+ million households without electricity, a million households without water, and nuclear meltdowns. People still living in temporary housing today.

Yuzuru himself was practicing on the ice when the earthquake struck. The rink was heavily damaged and subsequently closed, his blades were ruined, his house was partially damaged, he and his family lived in an evacuation center for a few days, and he had to make decisions regarding his future as a skater while shouldering survivor's guilt. It's an event which has deeply influenced him over the years and lies as one undercurrent in his skating. In fact, the disaster became such a part of his identity that for years you couldn't watch a single competition without the commentators relating the information: "he comes from Sendai, Japan which was struck by the earthquake and tsunami in 2011; he was on the ice when it happened; ran outside in his skating boots; for three days he stayed in an evacuation camp." Even now, Yuzuru continues his efforts to help the reconstruction through donations, charity auctions, and raising awareness.

The Requiem EX is a tribute to the memory of that day and the emotions Yuzuru carried. The music he chose was a piece created and performed by Yasunobu Matsuo who had similarly composed it for the disaster.

What makes this version of the EX particularly poignant, is that it follows Yuzuru's silver medal finish at the end of a successful record-breaking season when he had been hoping to reclaim his World title, yet lost once again to his rinkmate Javier Fernandez. That season he suffered a lisfranc fracture in his foot which threw his future career into uncertainty. He skates here with the mentality of a "last skate."

Whenever I watch this program, I'm struck by the emotion expressed, the freedom that he skates with when compared to previous versions, the musicality, the expressions on his face...I can't help remembering the circumstances surrounding it and what went into creating it. More than an exhibition piece, it's a story he's communicating to the public, but rather than projecting a character or story line, he connects to the audience by inviting us into his private moments.

this was the 2nd yuzu program i ever saw. since i discovered the FS fandom/world like right after this season ended so it was at the top of utube's algorithm for yuzu right after his 2014 Olympic short. and WOW. when i tell u started getting teary eyed about it before i even KNEW who he was (properly) like.. wow is it a stunning performance.

No, I'm serious, if women all got together and went into electrical engineering or automotive repair en masse, then ten years later people would be talking about how it was a "soft field" and it would pay proportionately less than other fields.

Likewise, if men moved en masse to bedeck themselves in sparkles and make-up, then suddenly you'd get a bunch of editorials talking about how classy they look.

None of these things are inherently masculine or feminine; none of these things inherently elevate you or drag you down. But whatever women are seen to do is automatically seen as being inherently more frivolous than anything men do. And shaming women for not pigeonholing themselves into a narrow range of acceptable “masculine” behaviours is just going to result in the goalposts getting moved once again.

This is literally what happened to basically every field women have entered. The opposite happens when men enter. Computers used to be a “woman thing” until the guys who did it got really mad about how badly their job was viewed and realized they could fix it by forcing out women.

meariver Follow

Also happened/ is happening with the fields of biology and psychology....

quasi-normalcy Follow

I honestly wonder how much of the backlash against public education in the last generation has been due to teaching becoming a woman-dominated profession.

warpedellipsis Follow

Fashion used to be a men’s thing. Then women got involved in the late 17/1800’s, so men went the other way because it came to be seen as “frivolous” and “anti-intellectual” to care about how you looked. Add in the homophobia that arose around that time, bam, staid bland dress. Ditto leggings/tights, that are now called attention-whoring when on men they were required to show you cared about your figure and had the money to pay for such a fitted item.

People want to say misogyny doesn’t exist, that male privilege doesn’t exist. Look beyond “living memory” and you’ll find that’s what drives the “inexplicable reversals” society seems to make on many things. Hell, just look beyond your own society, and you’ll find out that what’s considered “for men” elsewhere is held in high esteem while here it’s scoffed at purely because it’s “for women”:

- Skinny jeans are the height of masculinity in several east Asian societies, rather than being seen as “gay” in the USA because of their association with femininity.
- Medical fields in Russia are valued like kindergarten teachers are here, because it’s women who are the doctors instead of men.
- Love and romance are highly valued in eastern countries, because men are interested in it too—of course they would be, surely you want to share your life with someone? Here, it’s strictly a women’s subject.

darksnowfalling Follow

The field of anthropology as a whole illustrates this.

Significantly higher proportions of females compared to males are currently entering the fields of archaeology and biological anthropology, and as this occurs, the prestige, funding, acceptance as valid kinds of science, etc, are fading quickly.

This has already occurred with linguistic anthropology and cultural anthropology. Cultural anthropology in particular went VERY quickly from being seen as a manly, scientific discipline (e.g., Franz Boas, Bronisław Malinowski) to being seen as a touchy-feely female thing.

Let’s examine a traditionally male-dominated role that is very well-respected, and well-paid, in many parts of the world — that of a doctor. In the UK, it is listed as one of the top ten lucrative careers, and the average annual income of a family doctor in the US is well into six figures. It also confers on you significant social status, and a common stereotype in Asian communities is of parents encouraging their children to become doctors.

One of my lecturers at university once presented us with this thought exercise: why are doctors so highly paid, and so well-respected? Our answers were predictable. Because they save lives, their skills are extremely important, and it takes years and years of education to become one. All sound, logical reasons. But these traits that doctors possess are universal. So why is it, she asked, that doctors in Russia are so lowly paid? Making less than £7,500 a year, it is one of the lowest paid professions in Russia, and poorly respected at that. Why is this?

The answer is crushingly, breathtakingly simple. In Russia, the majority of doctors are women. Here's a quote from Carol Schmidt, a geriatric nurse practitioner who toured medical facilities in Moscow: "Their status and pay are more like our blue-collar workers, even though they require about the same amount of training as the American doctor… medical practice is stereotyped as a caring vocation 'naturally suited' to women, [which puts it at] a second-class level in the Soviet psyche."

What this illustrates perfectly is this — women are not devalued in the job market because women's work is seen to have little value. It is the other way round. Women's work is devalued in the job market because women are seen to have little value. This means that anything a woman does, be it childcare, teaching, or doctoring, or rocket science, will be seen to be of less value simply because it is done mainly by women. It isn't that women choose jobs that are in lower-paid industries, it is that any industry that women dominate automatically becomes less respected and less well-paid.

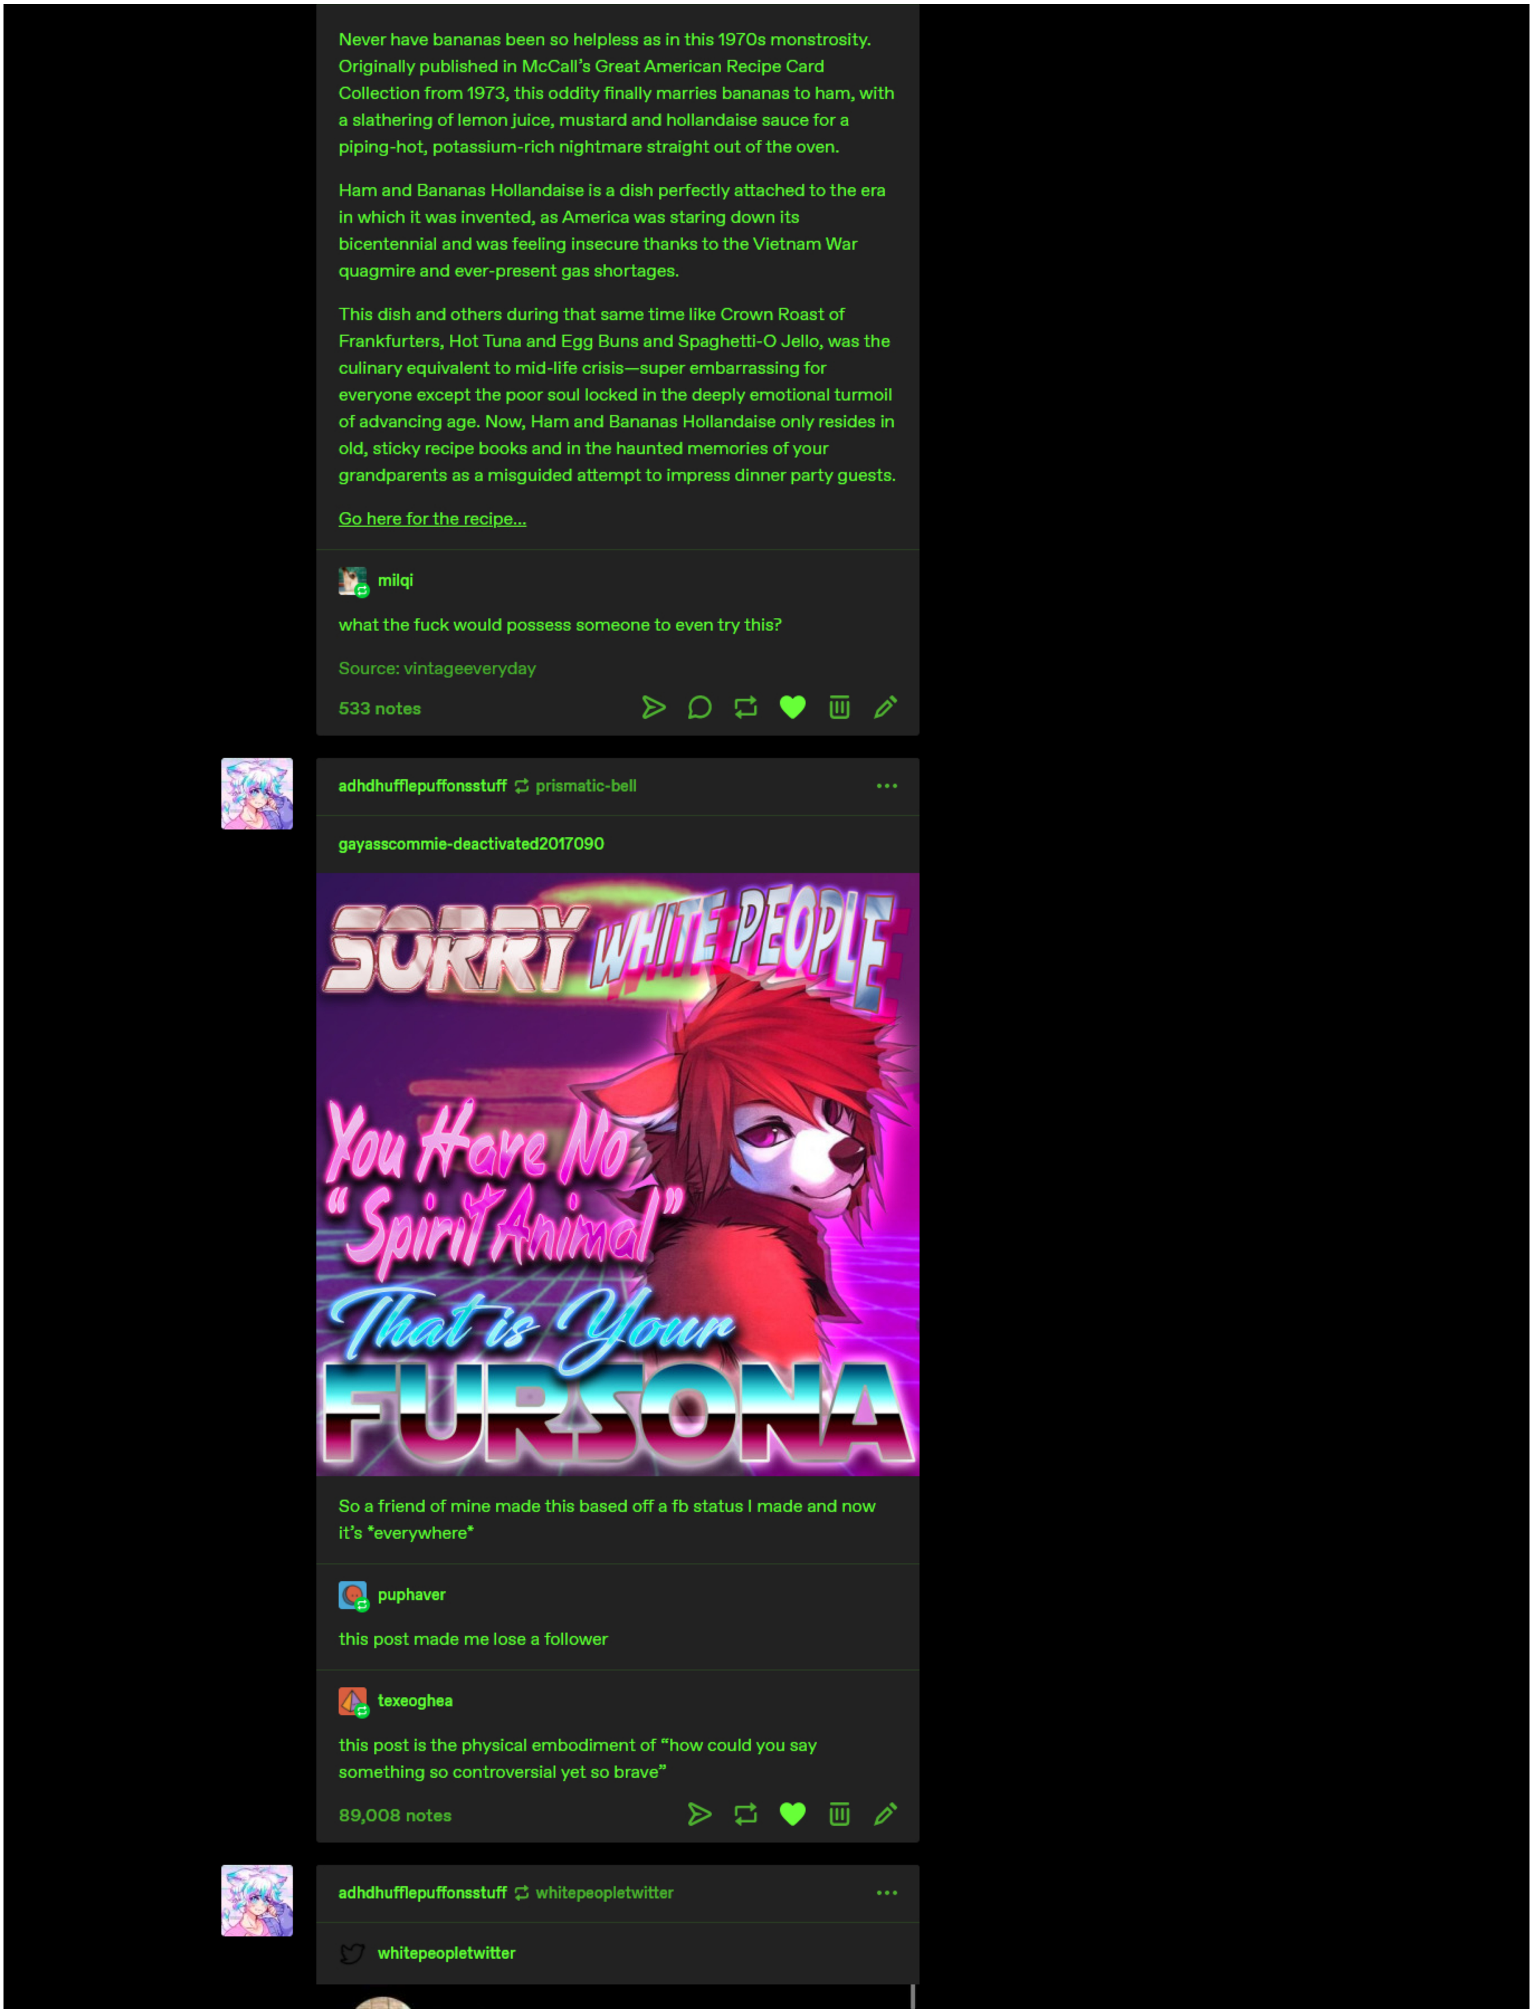
CONTEMPORARY COOKING 60
HAM AND BANANAS HOLLANDAISE
McCall's Great American Recipe Card Collection

www.vintag.es/2020/10/banana-and-ham-hollandaise.html



Never have bananas been so helpless as in this 1970s monstrosity. Originally published in McCall's Great American Recipe Card Collection from 1973, this oddity finally marries bananas to ham, with a slathering of lemon juice, mustard and hollandaise sauce for a piping-hot, potassium-rich nightmare straight out of the oven.

Ham and Bananas Hollandaise is a dish perfectly attached to the era in which it was invented, as America was staring down its bicentennial and was feeling insecure thanks to the Vietnam War quagmire and ever-present gas shortages.

This dish and others during that same time like Crown Roast of Frankfurters, Hot Tuna and Egg Buns and Spaghetti-O Jello, was the culinary equivalent to mid-life crisis—super embarrassing for everyone except the poor soul locked in the deeply emotional turmoil of advancing age. Now, Ham and Bananas Hollandaise only resides in old, sticky recipe books and in the haunted memories of your grandparents as a misguided attempt to impress dinner party guests.

Go here for the recipe...

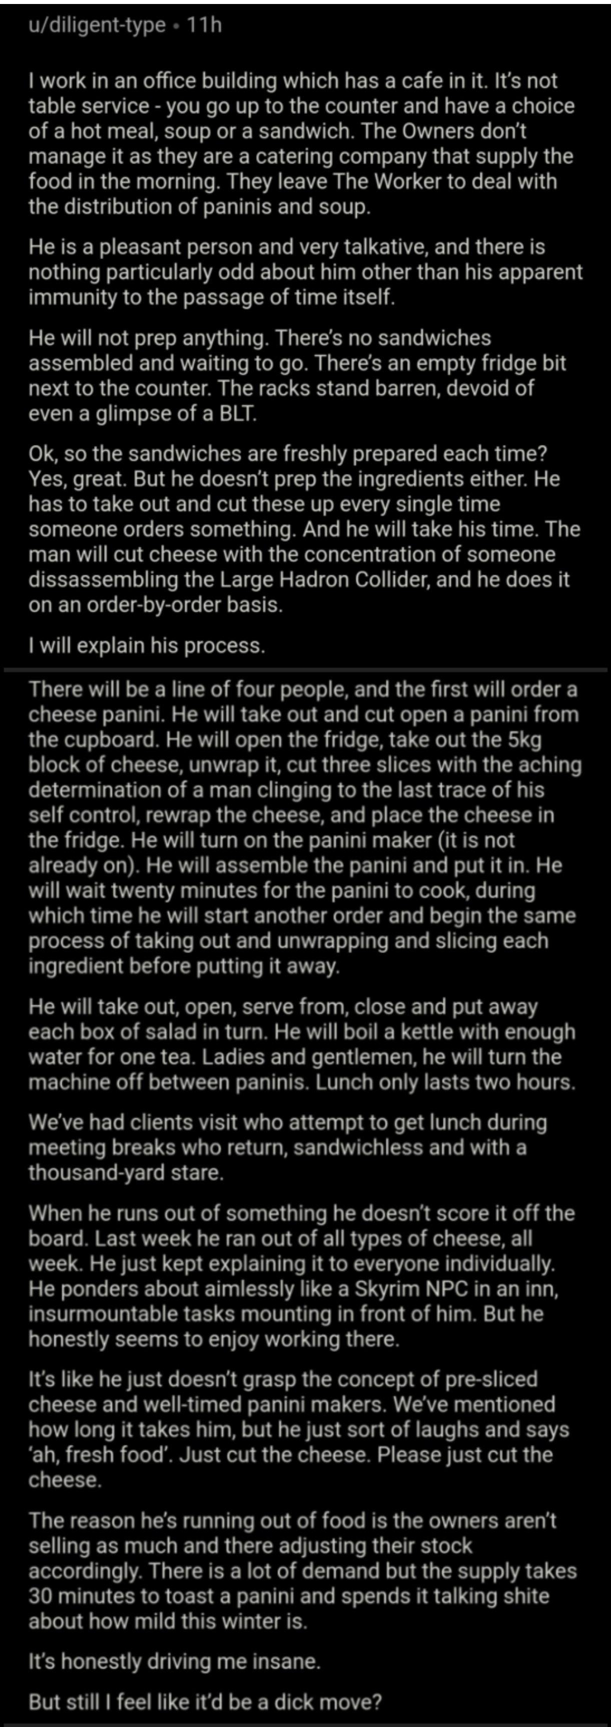
WIBTA if I complained to the owners of a cafe about how long it takes their employee to cut cheese?



u/diligent-type • 11h

I work in an office building which has a cafe in it. It's not table service - you go up to the counter and have a choice of a hot meal, soup or a sandwich. The Owners don't manage it as they are a catering company that supply the food in the morning. They leave The Worker to deal with the distribution of paninis and soup.

He is a pleasant person and very talkative, and there is nothing particularly odd about him other than his apparent immunity to the passage of time itself.

He will not prep anything. There's no sandwiches assembled and waiting to go. There's an empty fridge bit next to the counter. The racks stand barren, devoid of even a glimpse of a BLT.

Ok, so the sandwiches are freshly prepared each time? Yes, great. But he doesn't prep the ingredients either. He has to take out and cut these up every single time someone orders something. And he will take his time. The man will cut cheese with the concentration of someone dissassembling the Large Hadron Collider, and he does it on an order-by-order basis.

I will explain his process.

There will be a line of four people, and the first will order a cheese panini. He will take out and cut open a panini from the cupboard. He will open the fridge, take out the 5kg block of cheese, unwrap it, cut three slices with the aching determination of a man clinging to the last trace of his self control, rewrap the cheese, and place the cheese in the fridge. He will turn on the panini maker (it is not already on). He will assemble the panini and put it in. He will wait twenty minutes for the panini to cook, during which time he will start another order and begin the same process of taking out and unwrapping and slicing each ingredient before putting it away.

He will take out, open, serve from, close and put away each box of salad in turn. He will boil a kettle with enough water for one tea. Ladies and gentlemen, he will turn the machine off between paninis. Lunch only lasts two hours.

We've had clients visit who attempt to get lunch during meeting breaks who return, sandwichless and with a thousand-yard stare.

When he runs out of something he doesn't score it off the board. Last week he ran out of all types of cheese, all week. He just kept explaining it to everyone individually. He ponders about aimlessly like a Skyrim NPC in an inn, insurmountable tasks mounting in front of him. But he honestly seems to enjoy working there.

It's like he just doesn't grasp the concept of pre-sliced cheese and well-timed panini makers. We've mentioned how long it takes him, but he just sort of laughs and says 'ah, fresh food'. Just cut the cheese. Please just cut the cheese.

The reason he's running out of food is the owners aren't selling as much and there adjusting their stock accordingly. There is a lot of demand but the supply takes 30 minutes to toast a panini and spends it talking shite about how mild this winter is.

It's honestly driving me insane.

But still I feel like it'd be a dick move?

Diligent-Type 1.1k points · 6 hours ago

Thanks for this, that seems like the best course of action. I've discussed this with several other key players in the cheese drama, and think we're going to do a bit of recon on the situation. We're sending the least threatening among us, in a fluffy cardigan, to the cafe to ask him if he can prep the food or if it's a weird owner thing (words will be chosen better than this). We'll go when he isn't busy (which, honestly, is any other time not between 12 and 2). If he says 'I am not allowed' we will take it up with owners, emphasising how lovely he is and that we think the lack of prep specifically (which we have established is not his fault, but a top down command, but obviously will not reveal) is an issue and we've noticed a long wait. If he says 'what is prep?' I will erupt, feral, from the cardigan screaming, pounce over the counter and eat the entire five kilograms of cheese.

Firestone has operated a rubber plantation in Liberia since 1926.

Firestone farm

The Firestone farm, the world's single largest rubber plantation, has operated in this West African nation since 1926. Mar 29, 2019

Firestone's profits after taxes amounted to three times the government's total revenue for 1951, according to one study. [...] [A]fter the colony declared itself independent in 1847 [...], some of the settlers built Southern-style mansions [...]. Firestone arrived in Liberia in the 1920s. By that time, Harvey S. Firestone Sr., the farm boy from Ohio who founded the Firestone Tire and Rubber Co., had become one of the top industrialists of the gilded age. He dreamed of finding a rubber source beyond the grasp of the British Empire, which controlled much of the world market. In Liberia, he found a spot in the narrow band around the equator where rubber trees thrived – and a nation that was in debt and desperate for business. After two years of negotiations, Firestone and Liberia announced one of history's great sweetheart deals. Liberia gave Firestone the right to lease up to 1 million acres — roughly 10 percent of the country's arable land. The cost? Six cents an acre. The term? Ninety-nine years.

As Taylor's wild boys tore up Monrovia, the plantation was humming.

The expats made their daily commute from the guest-house to the Firestone office and factories a little more than 3 miles away. In October, they celebrated a new milestone: factory production had reached a record for the year: 4.7 million pounds of rubber.

The managers knew, of course, that a big attack was going on. The hospital was filled with wounded NPFL soldiers. The roads were mostly blocked.

They kept their heads down and worried about the rubber.

Published by Miller and Jones, ProPublica, 2014.

[In 1926] an eight-member scientific team from Harvard University [moved] through the interior regions of Liberia and the Belgian Congo. [...] Over time, the paths of empire, aided by science and medicine, would become well worn, solidifying Firestone's presence and reach in the Liberian landscape. [...] Disease and rubber had and reach in the Liberian landscape. [...] Disease and rubber had brought the Harvard African expedition to Liberia. In 1926 Firestone Tire and Rubber Company had secured a ninety-nine-year lease for up to a million acres of land from the Liberian government to establish one of the world's largest rubber plantations. But Firestone faced significant challenges in transforming the tropical rain forest into an industrial plantation. [...] In 1914 Richard P. Strong [had been] recently appointed director of Harvard's new Department of Tropical Medicine [...]. [I]t was precisely the infrastructures of multinational firms like United Fruit Company, Firestone Tire and Rubber Company, and American petroleum companies overseas that Strong regarded as ideal assets in pursuing the kind of [...] research he envisioned. In 1914, just one year after the creation of Harvard's Department of Tropical Medicine, Strong took on an additional assignment that cemented the ties between his department and American business interests abroad. As newly appointed director of the Laboratories of the Hospitals and of Research Work of United Fruit Company, he set sail in July 1914 to United Fruit plantations in Cuba, Guatemala, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Panama. [...]

As a shareholder in two British rubber plantations, Strong was acutely aware of the threat that Britain's rubber monopoly posed to America's economic interests. Strong approached Harvey Firestone, chief executive of the tire and rubber-processing conglomerate that bore his name, in December 1925 with a proposal to conduct an extensive biological and medical survey of the interior region of Liberia. Strong found a receptive ear. Firestone had negotiated tentative agreements in 1925 with the Liberian government for rights to a 2,000-acre plantation for experiments in rubber production, as well as a 99-year concession to optionally lease up to a million acres of Liberian land for rubber plantations. [...]

The Firestone plantations became an important node in a network of industrial plantations [...]. The paths of empire that sustained the transoceanic exchange of biological specimens, commodities, and knowledge in the growth of industrial plantation economies reached across the Atlantic and extended deep into Liberia's hinterland. Nowhere is this more apparent than in the expedition footage. Traveling by motorboat up the Du River to the site of the Firestone plantations, traversing the interior by foot with the aid of hundreds of porters, and journeying on roads in the making, all project the reach and anticipatory future of Firestone's operations in Liberia. [...] Within two decades, the expedition path would become the rubber corridor of Liberia: a 100-mile stretch of road, initially built with corvee labor, that reaches from Harbel, the center of the Firestone plantations, to Gbarnga, the hub of Bong County and the Kpelle people. [...] Roads built to foster Firestone's connectivity to Indigenous labor served to heighten land alienation. [...] Roads also became the corridors through which profits flowed. In 1951 more than 79 million pounds of raw latex, valued at more than $48 million, moved along the former expedition path. Firestone owned 94 percent of that latex [...].

In July 1993, Firestone answered Sawyer's charges with a lengthy letter defending the company's actions.

The letter, never previously reported, provides a candid articulation of the moral, economic and legal calculus conducted at the highest levels of a major American corporation.

> "Firestone, which is a corporate 'person' as a matter of law, cannot be seen to have committed an offense merely by submitting to the power and authority of the NPFL over its assets," the letter said.

Back in the United States, Firestone was engaged in its own war — albeit in a courtroom.

Firestone told U.S. Embassy officials that the company had lost more than $200 million between 1990 and 1994 in Liberia. But Firestone's insurance claims had been rejected. The company's policies did not cover losses sustained in war.

In 1994, Firestone filed suit based on a bold legal theory: What had happened in Liberia was not a war. It had been a civil conflict. Thus, the insurance companies, AIG and Cigna, had unfairly denied Firestone's claims. Published by Miller and Jones, ProPublica, 2014.

"It hurts me especially when I see tires marked Firestone," the 30-year-old said. "I look at them and say 'My God, this rubber comes from right here, and returns to us in finished products."

Question, do you spread it with some sort of utensil or do you dip the brush in

GENUINE QUESTION: if you "squeeze" out too much toothpaste onto your toothbrush, how do y'all put it back into those little tubes???????

It's gone. We don't look back on failure.

But if you had a toothpaste spoon and a bucket, you could just put it back :((((((((((((((

OKAY, for everyone asking - this is how the toothpaste spoon looks like! It's ceramic and you buy it at the drugstore and most people keep theirs with their toothbrush. Mine is brown and my mom has a white one, but they all come in different colors!

To answer a lot of people's question: this package is 2kg, there's also, 5kg and 10kg ones (which used to be sold in most stores, but you can find them only in specialized ones nowadays). There are some tiny ones, like 0.5 kg! Those are the ones you buy to carry when you travel.

nanashi-rei-official Follow

For the americans out there, 1kg is about 2lbs. Rewriting this bost gives:

"To answer a lot of people's question: this package is [4lbs] there's also, [10lbs] and [20lbs] ones (which used to be sold in most stores, but you can find them only in specialized ones nowadays). There are some tiny ones, like 1lb! Those are the ones you buy to carry when you travel."

Croatians apparently take a pound of toothpast with them when they travel.

I now live in fear of the Croatians.

So since Animal Crossing is huge again on the Switch I guess someone dug up our engagement through the GameCube game 15 years ago. Here's a new pic of the fam. Still married and have 3 awesome kids. We both have a New Horizons island and are enjoying the new game with our family.

Happy birthday to Claude Monet, who was born on this day in 1840. Often called the Father of Impressionism, Monet inspired the term that defined this movement. Born in Paris, Monet would later live in Giverny, where he purchased a property, planted sprawling gardens, and painted his famous water lilies.

"prince consort" is the sexiest royal title, it says 'the reigning monarch married this man just to fuck him' and that's so valid. nobody who actually understands court hierarchy correct me this is the world i want to live in the only reason i want to correct op is because "royal bedfellow" is a real title and it means exactly what it says, and james the first made it george villiers' title after like seven rank promotions, which he gave him specifically because he was his hot hunting party boytoy

This site is poison, and I sincerely and absolutely mean that. You were here since 2012? I was since 2009. Please, wake up, I beg you. Please stop being misled by all these labels and infighting and utopian ideals, it's not worth it. Stop living life for cheap pleasure. Seeing innocent people be led to chaos like this makes me cry.
